Molecular dynamics simulations were performed for the mixture of two flammable liquids, 1,2-dichloroethane (DCE) and n-hexane (Hex), to investigate the dynamics and structure of the liquid mixture. The time-averaged pair distribution functions show that DCE molecules are arranged in a polar fashion, while the hexane molecules are distributed in a disordered fashion. The second virial coefficients indicate that there is no attractive interaction between the two liquids. In the simulations, we observed that the formation of two types of clusters occurs at the early stage. This phenomenon is attributed to the combination of the repulsive interaction between the two liquids and the attractive interaction between DCE molecules. At the later stage, the hexane molecules are packed more tightly around the large DCE clusters, forming the so-called megaclusters. We also observed that the interaction between the two liquids is enhanced with increasing temperature and that the cohesive force between the two liquids is significant at the late stage.Alterations in the kinetic properties of the yeast Sec23p proteinase N complex during translocation of proteins across the ER.
