Q: Is there an agreed standard when writing the references in a book? I'm working on a book, and the publisher is suggesting that I make the references in the book self-contained and in the appropriate order. I'm quite used to writing technical documents with a table of contents, and the publisher is suggesting that, for a book, the references should be mentioned in a different way. For example, while a table of contents lists (alphabetical order) the texts in which I refer, in a book they should be mentioned at the end and ordered by book and then by chapter. I'm used to writing a technical book with a table of contents, and I just don't know if this is an accepted standard practice in the book business. Could you help me? A: Your publisher's request sounds reasonable to me. The question is just what is meant by "order" and what is meant by "self-contained". To be self-contained, the references would need to be accessible in any order. (You could include a few endnotes at the end to show where the references are.) It's possible to self-cite, but it's risky and can lead to information overload. To be ordered, you would probably need to include your endnotes in order, with each book on a different page. It's up to you d4474df7b8
